How to help your kids become money-savvy grownups

As parents, we’re constantly teaching our children.

By getting our children involved with their money—and ours—we can help them get money ahead long before they leave the nest.

Model money management.

Kids are always watching us. Take advantage of that by talking about how you manage your finances. Kids are never too young to learn about money.

When you pay with a credit card, talk about how you must pay for those purchases when your credit card statement arrives.

Talk about the bills you pay, and explain how your checking account works—how your paychecks go into the account and how you use those funds to both build your savings and pay your bills.

Involve kids in the kitchen.

Think about how much we—and our children—can save by cooking more meals at home. Teach your kids how to cook, and let them help you go through the ads to find the best deals and coupons to save even more.

Help them save, spend and share.

When you teach your kids the three pillars of money management—save, spend and share—you empower them to make decisions on their own and value their money.

As your kids age and become responsible for more of their purchases, help them create a budget so they know how much they can spend on gas, clothes and other purchases.

Consider two savings accounts.

As you help your children learn how to save, consider setting up a couple of accounts—one the kids can’t touch and one they can use.

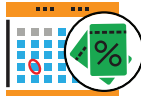

When they want access to funds in that second savings account, bring your kids to the credit union so they have to physically take out the cash, bring it to the store and watch it disappear when they buy the game or toy they wanted.

It’s a great way for kids to get hands-on experience with both saving and spending.

Take advantage of your membership.

Show your kids how to take advantage of discounts—and how the savings add up. As Dupaco members, you have access to discounts to some great events and destinations.

There are plenty of other ways to save, too, including discounted movie days and free admission days to family-friendly destinations.
